

Abstract

Recombinant host cells that produce rapamycin analogues are constructed by deleting or modifying rapamycin biosynthetic gene cluster genes and are useful in the production of compounds used as antifungals, anticancers, immunosuppressants, and neurotrophins.